Workers' Comp and Social Media, Tonight on 'The American Law Journal'

There used to be a time when the only way a workers' compensation insurance carrier might catch a worker fibbing about his or her job injury was through surveillance. That still happens. But today, all an employer might need is to go to the injured employee's Facebook page.

Tonight at 7 on the Philadelphia CNN-News affiliate station WFMZ-TV, "The American Law Journal" presents "Social Media, Surveillance and the Injured Worker."

Joining host Christopher Naughton are claimants lawyers George Badey of Badey Sloan & DiGenova and Halmon Banks of Martin Banks, respondents counsel Anthony Salvino of White & Williams and Workers' Compensation Judge Joseph Hakun.

"There are plenty of times that an employer will attempt to use surveillance or Facebook as evidence. More often than not, we have a defense," Badey said. "Still, it makes things harder. I tell clients, 'Be careful.' If you are injured and you post on Facebook 'having a wonderful time at Disney World' that can create problems even where there are none."

"The American Law Journal" is the weekly talk-feature program airing on WFMZ-TV 69. All live programs stream online at www.wfmz.com. View programs, schedules, lawyer profiles and more on www.lawjournalty.com.
